

The Man I Admire

By Ryan Marshall

There is a man I've long admired,
Whose heart is broken and soul is tired,
His loving face now sad and worn,
Has only begun to weather the storm,
The jaws have been closed on death's firm trap,
Now he's on a journey, but has no map,
A journey ripe with fear and confusion,
Where comfort maybe a mere illusion,
But in his life there still is some love,
Some from his family, and some from above,
Love that can brighten the darkest place,
And put a smile on the saddest face,
And alone he can't handle this cruel twist of fate,
The burden's too heavy the pain is too great,
And his loved ones will say as he walks this long mile,
Give us your load, and rest for a while,
Maybe his sorrow will ease through the years,
After quite a few laughs, and a whole lot of tears,
But I know that he'll make it through the rain and the fire,
Because he is a man that I'll always admire.
